

Task: Replace the middle man

We run a creative agency.

Every design request we receive needs five things before we can act on it: what the client wants designed, what it's for, their deadline, brand guidelines or references, and their budget range.

Right now, someone on our team manually reads each request, spots what's missing, writes back to the client asking for it, waits, and then routes the complete request to the right person. Riya owns social media and marketing creatives. Sameer owns decks and presentations. Priya owns brand identity — logos, style guides, that kind of work.

That someone is drowning.

A client just wrote in:

"Hey, we need a logo for our new coffee brand. Something minimal and modern. We're thinking earthy tones. Let us know what you need from us!"

This is sitting in the queue right now, untouched, waiting for a human to deal with it.

Your job: be that human. Except don't be human about it.

Build something that reads this, knows what's missing, asks for exactly that — and routes it the moment it's complete. You have 30 minutes. Start wherever makes sense to you.

When time's up, we want to know two things: what it does, and what you chose not to build — and why.
